The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) embodies 30 articles that assert fundamental rights for all individuals regardless of race, religion, or status. These include rights such as life, liberty, and security; freedom from torture; recognition before the law; privacy protection; freedom of thought and religion; fair working conditions; adequate standard of living; and the right to education. The UDHR sets a foundation for a just society where everyone can live freely and contribute to the freedom of others. It calls humanity to action, emphasizing that human rights must be respected and upheld in every community to have significance globally.
